STAR WARS

As Senator for Naboo, Padmé Amidala was granted the use of several vessels normally reserved for the Theed-based royalty. As well as the Royal Yacht, Padmé also used the larger, better-equipped J-type star skiff. This was very much a product of the Clone Wars, its chrome finish broken by the powerful engines needed for quick getaways and, almost unthinkably, by the laser cannon it might have to rely on when all else failed.

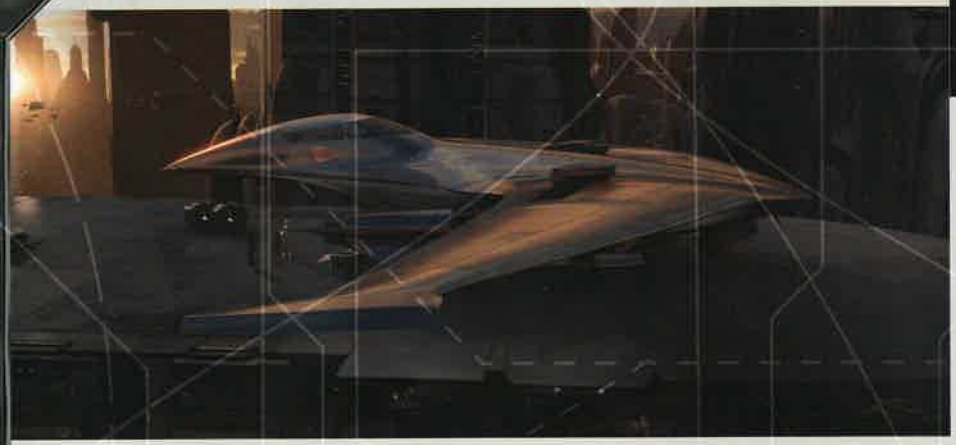
J-TYPE NUBIAN STAR SKIFF

A VESSEL FOR TROUBLED TIMES

Designed for then-reigning Naboo monarch Queen Apailana, the J-type Nubian star skiff carried over many of the features of the ill-fated J-type diplomatic barge. The skiff also showed that it was very much a product of the Clone Wars, and featured openly displayed weapons.



The explosive and tragic destruction of the Royal Naboo J-type diplomatic barge, blown up in an attempt on the life of Senator Padmé Amidala on Coruscant, necessitated the construction of a new Royal Starship. Once again, the vessel was designed and constructed by the unique partnership of the Theed Palace Space Vessel Engineering Corps and Nubia Star Drives Incorporated. The resulting starship was recognisably a Naboo ship, but there were telling changes to established patterns.

Unfinished Appearance

The J-type star skiff designed and built for the Naboo queen did have the usual chrome finish, but this didn't form the usual unblemished finish over the whole ship. The outlets from the two powerful Sossen-7 sublight engines slung under the wings were a glittering bronze colour, before regular use tarnished them somewhat, and there were exposed access grilles and vents. Then there were the two laser cannons, mounted on top of the wings. While they were not powerful enough to make the ship an aggressor, their addition was controversial and deeply saddening to many on Naboo. However, the danger faced by diplomats in general and Padmé Amidala in particular made the bitter pill a little easier to swallow.

Support

The star skiff was 10 metres shorter than Padmé Amidala's official diplomatic barge had been, and it only had around half the wingspan. However, the vessel was still very well equipped. It was also speedy, which ensured that the limited weapons it carried were enough to cover a quick getaway in case of trouble. The hyperdrive system was a class 0.5 – very fast for such a relatively small ship. Furthermore, in case it needed more defensive capability, the ship could act as a refuelling partner for its own supporting N-1 starfighter escort, much as the diplomatic barge had done previously.

Even in troubled times, the interior of the star skiff remained very well appointed. It could easily be flown by a single pilot, the controls being standard for the majority of Naboo vessels. There was plenty of storage space, and accommodation for six passengers in addition to the compact but effective Royal (or Senatorial) suite, the bedroom of which doubled as a throne room if necessary. A medical suite, again small but effective, was there for emergencies. Though more utilitarian than other Royal Naboo vessels, the star skiff retained enough presence and class that it was a worthy addition to the Theed Palace fleet.

FINAL VOYAGE

FLIGHT TO MUSTAFAR

The Royal Naboo star skiff served Senator Padmé Amidala well during the Clone Wars, carrying her around the galaxy on a number of occasions. However, her last journey was to end disastrously and saw the J-type star skiff retired from service.

Padmé had use of a sleek Royal H-type Nubian yacht, but sometimes the greater space – and greater impact – provided by the star skiff was more useful. While travelling into the depths of the Coruscant underworld to negotiate with Ziro the Hutt, the star skiff allowed her to make a highly visible arrival, and underlined her diplomatic status. When Padmé travelled to Cato Neimoidia with Senator Rush Clovis, they travelled in the star skiff in order to accommodate Clovis better. Also, Padmé knew that the Neimoidians had an appreciation for unique and expensive things, such as the skiff – even if their hatred for the Naboo still burned bright after the Trade Federation's failed invasion.

Into The Fire

The Clone Wars were a blight on the galaxy, but their ending was not so welcome as Padmé had imagined. Instead, the eventual peace saw the Jedi Order declared traitors to the Republic, and a new Empire declared by Palpatine. Worse for Padmé was Obi-Wan's visit and the news that Anakin had fallen to the dark side of the Force. Padmé knew that her husband was on Mustafar. Leaving Captain Typho behind on Coruscant, she took the star skiff, piloted by C-3PO, and made haste to Anakin's side. Unknown to her, Obi-Wan Kenobi had hidden himself aboard the ship. Padmé Amidala confronted Anakin, but discovered that he was lost to darkness. On seeing Obi-Wan, he choked Padmé with the Force. Though Anakin was defeated by Obi-Wan, the trauma that Padmé had suffered was too great for her. The medical suite aboard the skiff could barely stabilise her condition and she later died. Her body was returned to Naboo for a state funeral, and the star skiff was retired – its presence a painful reminder of Padmé.

DARTH SIDIOUS

THE APPRENTICE OF DARTH PLAGUEIS

While some scholars of galactic history have questioned whether Palpatine of Naboo ever actually existed as an individual, none question the existence of his darker half – the Sith Lord, Darth Sidious. It was Sidious who brought down the Old Republic and established the Empire. Palpatine was merely a mask he wore.

After the seeming destruction of the Sith Order at the Seventh Battle of Ruusan, it would be nearly a thousand years before the dark side of the Force would rise to rule the galaxy, under perhaps its greatest disciple, Darth Sidious. In that time, under the Rule of Two imposed by Darth Bane, the Sith would exist as only two entities at any one time – a master and an apprentice.

Sith Survival

The two true Sith melted into the shadows, becoming rumour, hiding behind their own myth, enhancing it, building it until the Jedi themselves dismissed the Sith as extinct. Even those Jedi who believed the Sith still represented a threat couldn't separate truth from falsehood. Safe in the darkness, the Sith plotted, planned and survived. Each master would select and train a new apprentice, both knowing that the apprentice would one day destroy the master, take his place and then, on selecting their own apprentice, begin the whole process again.

Darth Plagueis the Wise

Some 60 years before the fall of the Jedi Order, the Sith Master was a Muun called Darth Plagueis. While Sith Lords understood that their apprentice would, as they had done, seek to overthrow and kill them, they hungered for immortality, for ultimate control over life. Darth Plagueis once boasted to his apprentice that he had found a way to create new life by directly manipulating the midi-chlorians present in all living beings through the dark side of the Force. The resulting being would be the very embodiment of the Force, and be capable of incredible things.

"Unfortunately, he taught his apprentice everything he knew. Then, his apprentice killed him in his sleep."

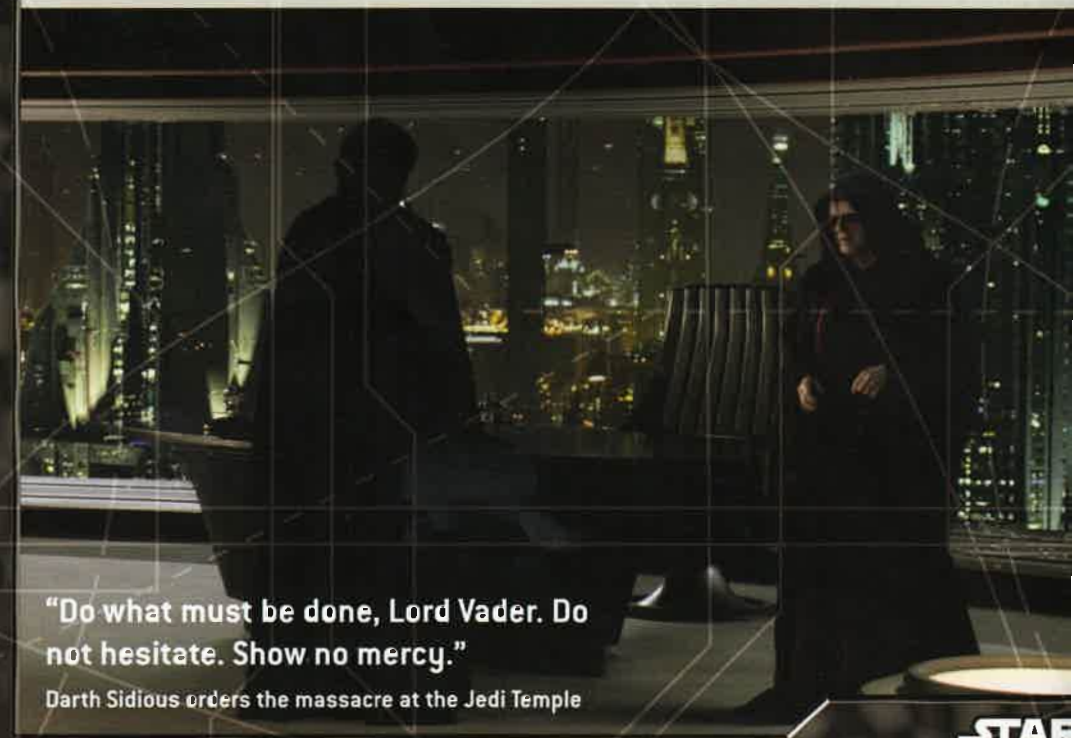
Rise of Darth Sidious

Plagueis' apprentice believed that his master sought to replace him with a being created from the Force itself. It was not at all unusual for a Sith Master to replace one apprentice with another, more worthy individual. Darth Sidious decided to strike first, so murdered Plagueis as he slept. Sidious now rose to become Sith Master, taking his own apprentice – Darth Maul. His murder of Plagueis haunted Sidious, as the destruction of each master commonly did. Sidious swore he would display no weakness such as sleep for his own apprentice to take advantage of. He also swore not to reveal to his apprentice all that he knew of Plagueis and his quest for immortality.

While the Sith had been content to survive for centuries since Ruusan, Darth Sidious was intent on nothing less than ruling the galaxy. As Palpatine of Naboo, Sidious began the long, slow process of building his overt political influence. Behind the scenes, Sidious began to build a series of darker, more subtle alliances. More than once, he sent his apprentice out to remove individuals or, as with the Black Sun crime cartel, whole organisations from his path. As Palpatine, Sidious was able to befriend members of



"Do what must be done, Lord Vader. Do not hesitate. Show no mercy."

Darth Sidious orders the massacre at the Jedi Temple

First Jedi

Darth Sidious used the guise of Palpatine to make contacts that could later be manipulated to serve the aims of the Sith. Ronhar Kim was the first Jedi befriended by Palpatine, not long after he became Senator for Naboo and the rest of the Chommell Sector. Ronhar was the son of Senator Vidar Kim, whom Palpatine replaced after Darth Sidious arranged his assassination. Palpatine first met Ronhar at Vidar's funeral – a nice touch.

the Jedi Order. Once, Sidious and Maul disguised themselves and stood for a day at the Jedi Temple, observing the comings and goings of those they sought to destroy. So skilled was Sidious that the Jedi never knew the Sith Lord and his apprentice were there.

War and Peace

With all his pieces in place, Darth Sidious made his first major play for ultimate power. Igniting a conflict on Palpatine's homeworld of Naboo, he further weakened an already fragile Republic, forcing the intervention of the Jedi Order. Though it cost him his apprentice, Sidious was content. He recruited a new apprentice; a fallen Jedi called Dooku, whom he renamed Darth Tyranus. With Tyranus at his side, Sidious was able to spark a galactic conflict between the Republic and the Separatists – the latter led by Dooku himself. Drawn into the Clone Wars, the Jedi and Republic were painfully vulnerable, while Palpatine drew more and more power to himself. Finally, Sidious sacrificed Darth Tyranus to draw his final apprentice to him. Anakin Skywalker was perhaps the living result of Darth Plagueis' experiments in creating life. He was certainly powerful, joining with Sidious to become Darth Vader even as his master destroyed the Old Republic and the Jedi Order and became Emperor of the galaxy.

GOZANTI CRUISER

THE KRAYT'S HONOUR

Before and during the Clone Wars, with the galaxy descending into chaos, merchant fleets plying the trade routes came under increasing pressure from pirate ships – some genuine freebooters, and some bought and paid for by the likes of the Trade Federation.

Independent merchants came up with a number of solutions to defend themselves. Some banded together to form larger convoys in the hope that strength of numbers would help deter the pirates. Others hired or bought armed starships to protect them, meeting force with force. Sometimes the weapons on these escorts were legal. Other times, reacting to the fact that the pirates didn't obey weapons restrictions, escort ships maintained a few hidden surprises.

Too Successful

Designed by the Corellian Engineering Corporation and built principally by Gallofree Yards, the Gozanti cruiser was a cheap, well-armoured transport designed to act as an escort for merchant vessels. Its weapons pushed the legal limits, and included two quad laser cannon batteries (four guns per battery), two quad laser cannon turrets and a proton torpedo launcher. The armour plating was designed to make the ship difficult to board, as well as to protect it from attack. It was relatively slow by design – no pirate would add this ship to their raider fleet. One of the most successful Gozanti cruisers was the Krayt's Honour, captained by the experienced Kel Dor spacer Siqo Vass. He upgraded his ship's weapons with three very illegal bow-mounted turbolasers, and a pair of proton torpedo launchers. The ship's deflector shields were military grade and also illegally obtained. Vass helped many independent merchants hold off Trade Federation-sponsored pirate attacks, and once saved Jabba the Hutt. When the Federation started hunting Vass, Jabba offered Krayt's Honour a safe port on Tatooine.

SENATORIAL TRANSPORT

The star skiff was originally a Royal Naboo vessel that was given on extended loan to Senator Padmé Amidala by the Queen of the Naboo. It served her well in her adventures during the Clone Wars. THE DEWBACK

REPTILIAN BEAST OF BURDEN

The deserts of Tatooine had a murderous effect on all forms of technology, not least vehicles. Their intakes clogged with sand and their engines overheated, meaning that landspeeders were often second best to a trusted, sure-footed dewback mount.

More easily domesticated than banthas or rontos, dewbacks were native to the Outer Rim desert world of Tatooine. They were large reptilian quadrupeds, growing to around 8m in length and to a height of around 2.1m. Omnivorous, occasionally solitary creatures, dewbacks in the wild normally came together in small packs. During the cold nights, when the reptiles became sluggish, the groups would bunch together for warmth. By the morning, dew would collect on their hides – a fact that gave the species its name. This precious moisture would be licked clean, and the members of the dewback pack would continue on their search for food.

Raised From The Egg

While domesticated animals could never match the speed of repulsorlift vehicles, they were more reliable. Although the dewback's biology meant it was next to useless at night, it was less ornery than the banthas and more practical than the huge, hungry rontos. Dewbacks were used as mounted transport and load haulers by everyone from moisture farmers to local (and visiting) Imperial troops. While adults could be broken in, it was recognised that dewbacks raised from eggs were the most reliable, even showing genuine attachment to their owners. Dewbacks were also a valuable source of food and raw materials – their hides being used for a number of things. Though mainly green, some dewbacks had red, brown or even grey colouration. Most rare of all were blue-skinned dewbacks, though most males' bellies turned shades of blue during the mating season, when even domesticated dewbacks had to be turned loose to make the long trek to the Jundland Wastes to find mates.

Did You Know...?

The original dewback was a full-sized mechanical puppet that would not work properly during filming in Tunisia. It was relegated to the background of shots in the finished film, including outside the Mos Eisley Cantina. The 1997 Star Wars: A New Hope Special Edition featured moving CGI dewbacks ridden by CGI stormtroopers.

CORUSCANT

THE EMPEROR PALPATINE SURGICAL RECONSTRUCTION CENTRE

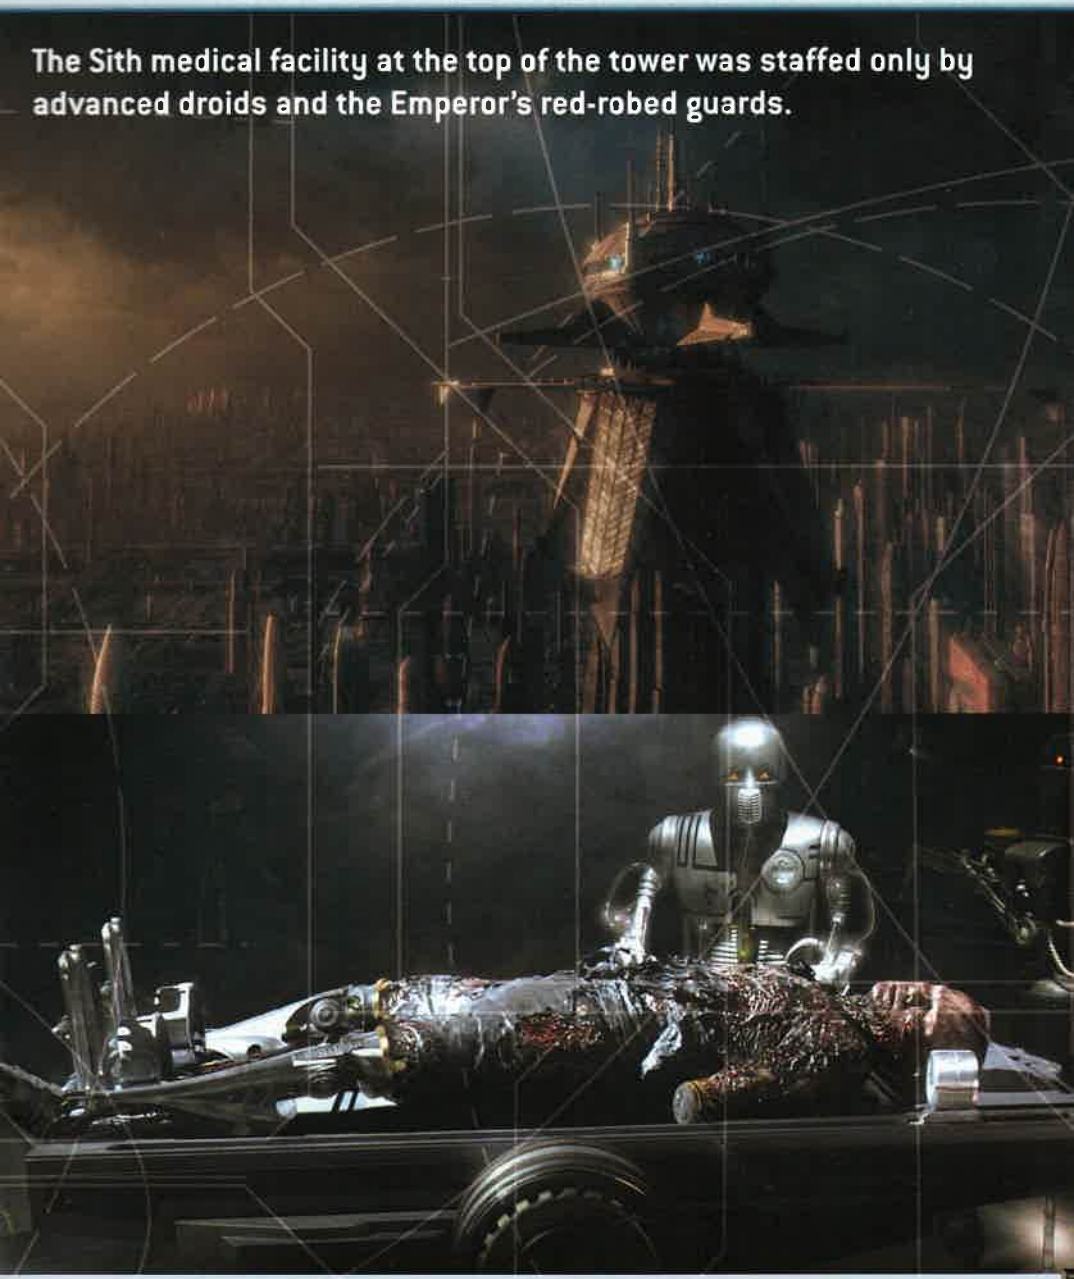
The Sith Order survived as Master and apprentice for a thousand years. In the last few years before his plans came to fruition and he declared himself Emperor, Darth Sidious had a secret Sith facility built on Coruscant – at the top of one of the tallest buildings on the planet.

Built in Galactic City on Coruscant, and personally sponsored by the then leader of the Galactic Senate, the Chancellor (later the Emperor) Palpatine Surgical Reconstruction Centre was a much needed, state-of-the-art hospital that specialised in treating victims of the Clone Wars – military and civilian – and of complex medical conditions. Dismissed by critics as a misguided vanity project meant to shore-up the Supreme Chancellor's fading popularity, the ChanPal SuRecon hospital was a magnet for desperately ill patients from across the galaxy. The facility was topped off by one of the tallest towers in Coruscant, from which projected four large landing platforms. These allowed transports carrying the most critically injured or sick patients to dock quickly and have their precious cargoes seen to in as short a time as possible.

Sith Centre

Of course, the Chancellor Palpatine Surgical Reconstruction Centre was also a lie. While patients were treated and lives were saved, what little good was done was crushed under the overwhelming weight of the evil that was wrought upon the galaxy from the Sith tower. Hidden in plain sight in a dazzlingly audacious move on the part of Darth Sidious, the heavily shielded uppermost section of the tower housed a repository of Sith artefacts that Darth Sidious drew upon for strength, inspiration and guidance. It was to that tower top, and the laboratory at its centre, that Sidious brought his apprentice – the mutilated, dying Darth Vader, rescued from Mustafar. In the laboratory, the medical droids that manned the facility forever sealed Vader

The Sith medical facility at the top of the tower was staffed only by advanced droids and the Emperor's red-robed guards.



Many of the medical droids working on Darth Vader had also worked on creating General Grievous. Vader's rage and pain destroyed them all with the dark side of the Force.

Did You Know...?

From the lightning-flashed castle tower to the dark, steam-filled operating room within, the Vader rehabilitation scene in Revenge of the Sith was meant to suggest the famous environment where Frankenstein's monster was created. The scene of Vader's transformation was shot on 1-2 September 2003 on Stage 4 of Fox Studios Australia – the first day for Hayden Christensen in full burn makeup, and the second day for him in his Darth Vader costume. On the 47th day of shooting on Episode III, a costumed Darth Vader returned in front of movie cameras after a lengthy hiatus.

away in the black, life-preserving armoured suit that became his identity throughout the Civil War.

Sith Fortress

The antennae at the very top of the ChanPal SuRecon hospital tower were used for day-to-day communication, true, but the uppermost level of the facility contained intelligence-gathering technology – databanks and analysis computers – all manned by technicians fanatically devoted to their master. These and the rest of the building drew their power from the fusion reactor set just below the comms level. The medical facilities beneath the reactor were used to treat Palpatine and his agents, and were also used in hideous Sith alchemical experiments on humans and aliens alike. Below the medical treatment areas lay the dark heart of the tower. Suspended over a great reservoir of dark Force energy, in which gigantic synthetic Sith crystals were hung, was Darth Sidious' extensive collection of Sith artefacts. Sith scrolls, holocrons, altars and so on – a gathering of Sith paraphernalia that the Jedi Order would have sacrificed much to see destroyed forever. Here, too, was Darth Sidious' personal meditation chamber. Below was a throne room, training facilities and much more. Clearly, this all needed to be defended. Shielded from even the most determined scanning, the seemingly innocuous tower with its 'revealing' gallery of huge windows concealed powerful batteries of VLD2261 long-range heavy blaster turrets, and point defence KDD2055 short-range turbolaser batteries. Lastly, being a hospital full of legitimate patients also served as a shield against any possible attack from the Jedi Order.

THE SITH ORDER

FROM THE DARK SIDE

In the 1974 rough draft of the story of The Star Wars, the legendary Jedi Bendu warriors were being hunted down by a new Empire and its ferocious Knights of Sith. This, then, was the origin of the conflict between good and evil in the Star Wars galaxy.

In the second draft of the Star Wars story, the conflict was detailed in a history of the hero of the piece – Luke Starkiller. The 12 children of a holy man called the 'Skywalker' were entrusted with the secret of the Force of Others, and its two halves – Ashla, the good, and Boan, the evil. These 12 children became the Jedi Bendu of the Ashla. Eventually, the corrupt Great Senate of the Republic declared the Jedi Bendu traitors and had them executed. This led to the birth of the Empire. The Emperor's bodyguards were Sith pirates, led by a former Padawan-Jedi named Darklighter, who had fallen to the dark side. These Sith hunted the Jedi, becoming stronger with each one they killed.

The Many Become Two

While there were originally intended to be a number of Sith, renamed the Legions of Lettow in later drafts, they were eventually encapsulated in a single individual, Darth Vader, in what became Star Wars: Episode IV A New Hope. During the publicity for the release of Episode III Revenge of the Sith, director George Lucas was asked by journalist Darren Rea to sum up who the Sith were:

"The Sith are people who are very self-centred and selfish. There used to be many Sith, but because they were corrupted by power and ambition, they killed each other off,

George Lucas on good and evil

"The idea of positive and negative, that there are two sides to an entity, a push and a pull, a yin and a yang, and the struggle between the two sides are issues of nature that I wanted to include in the film. Obviously, in terms of moral issues, you always have what's considered moral and what's considered immoral. At the same time, if you are dealing with possible influences beyond what we can see, it's traditionally been the good and the bad."

so now there are only two – a Master and an apprentice. Sith rely on their passion to get things done. They use their raw emotion, their hatred, their anger, their bitterness – which is the dark side of the Force."

Filling In The Gaps

The long history of conflict between the Jedi and the Sith has been documented in great detail over the years by a variety of Expanded Universe books, comics, games and even animated series. The comic book series Knights of the Old Republic took readers back to a time thousands of years before the Star Wars films. Comic books, novels and even short stories have showed the fall of the Sith at Ruusan and the rise of Darth Bane and the Rule of Two.

THE NABOO STAR SKIFF

ROYAL LUXURY IN TROUBLED TIMES

THE J-TYPE NUBIAN

1 Early development sketches from pre-production of Episode III used Padmé's yacht from Episode II, before the star skiff (above) was created.

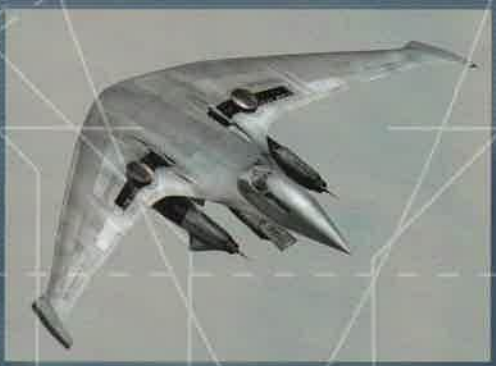
2 Concept Design Supervisor Ryan Church designed the star skiff. One of his early designs looked a little like a manta ray, with sublight engines projecting forward and given small side fins.

5 Originally, only the boarding ramp was constructed for filming the sequence following the landing on Mustafar.

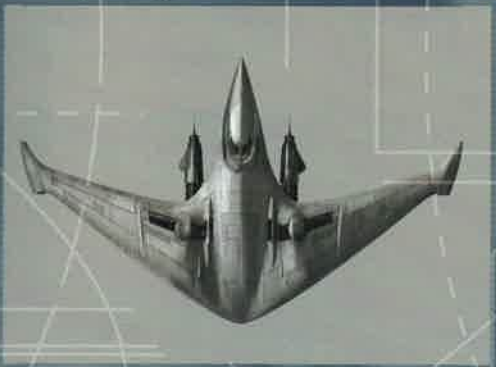
6 Even the cockpit interior was created digitally. The actors sat in the seats from the Episode II yacht but were filmed against greenscreen.

Creating the Naboo star skiff involved a cunning mix of digital wizardry, greenscreen filming, only a very limited number of full-scale sets, and some chairs from Episode II.

3 Church sketched the skiff as having add-on and modified features instead of the normal clean lines of Naboo ships, as though to suggest that it had been 'supercharged' for combat.



4 The star skiff was almost entirely realized as a digital creation.



7 During additional filming at Shepperton, more of the interior was created for the sequence where Padmé is lying in the skiff's medical bay.

8 A head-on view of the digital model of the Naboo star skiff, showing its slim lines and the 'tacked-on' appearance of the engines.

DID YOU KNOW?

1 What is the origin of the name 'dewback'?

2 When was the name 'Sith' first used?

3 What is the principal difference between the dewbacks filmed in the 1970s and those in the 1997 Special Edition of A New Hope?

ANSWERS:

1. The creatures get their name from the fact that dew condenses on their bodies overnight as they sleep.

2. The name 'Sith' was first used in the May 1974 rough draft of the story of The Star Wars.

3. The original dewback was a mechanical prop that was relatively immobile. The Special Edition dewbacks were entirely digital creations.
